

PARENTS, CAREGIVERS & FAMILY

CHILDREN: WHY IS THIS THEME SO IMPORTANT?

- When children have what they need to develop well in the early years, they can thrive and be healthy now and throughout their lives. Babies start developing good mental health and wellbeing from birth. When adults respond to, chat to and interact with babies, they help them develop important skills like the ability to cope with emotions and stress now and in the future.
- Supportive relationships with parents and whether one's family gets along are strongly associated with mental health outcomes. More parental support and family harmony are related to substantially higher happiness and life satisfaction and fewer cases of prolonged sadness or depression or stress.
- But not every family has what they need for positive development. It's important parents, families, caregivers feel supported too - we understand everyone is doing their best with what they have, often in challenging environments, however there is always room for better self care, reflection, adopting more effective strategies for improvement in any setting.

QUICK TIPS FOR BETTER MENTAL WELLBEING

- Connect meaningfully with your children, have fun, play, enjoy games with them, talk and listen, be an active part of your community.
- Positive wording helps your kids to think and act positively, and to feel capable in a wide range of situations. They will imagine success and talk themselves through to good outcomes. Our encouraging words stay with them for life.
- Babies and small children of course need their basic requirements met (to be fed, warmed and cleaned) but human contact and affection is also essential for optimal health and development.
- Essential engagements can include: Frequent hugs (skin-to-skin contact); movement of a gentle but robust kind, such as carrying around, bouncing on a knee, dancing etc; eye contact, smiling, talking at their face level; offering a colourful lively environment and healthy home; sharing sounds together such as singing, talking, reading out loud, and general daily chit chat.
- We all need to be recognised, noticed and preferably, given sincere praise. Children feel respected, heard and valued when they are included in conversations - positive reassurance does wonders.
- Ask your kids about their interests, hobbies and things they like to discuss. Talk to them, not down to them.
- Doing things together – don't expect to achieve anything to your usual standard if you are bringing children along for the task ride – settle for some progress of the actual job you are doing together and mainly have fun and genuinely engage together.
- Self-care is important - if you feel good children will pick on that energy and also soak up your renewed interest in them.
- Enjoy parenthood –time with kids is never wasted - remember they can make you feel young at heart!
- Don't lose your sense of humour! If tension rises, try to keep perspective and see the lighter side of the situation.
- Keep it simple: family bike rides, playing, drawing, dancing, reading books, or writing together can be all that's needed in the moment.
- For older children, journaling and /or talking with a trusted friend or family member is important to maintain good mental wellbeing. Sharing how you feel helps to filter our thoughts and reflections; and harness our hopes, dreams, goals, and plans.
- Being in the fresh air in nature and enjoying water play can always seem to diffuse, distract and delight people of any age!
- Get outdoors on the grass, head to the park, jump in puddles, run up the beach, soak up the sand pit, visit your local swimming pool - or even something as simple as an untimely bath or shower could do the trick- get some buckets and toys and have some fun!
- Singing is just as therapeutic and satisfying as singing to give those vocal chords a stretch and the frustrations at bay. Next time you are impatiently waiting for your kids to listen or you want something done – try singing it out! Singing how you feel can be very satisfying!
